At a tasting only one ounce of wine or ale is poured into your glass. There are more than 80 beverages to taste so it is important to pace your consumption. There are only one or two bottles of each type of wine (perhaps a few more of the beers); please do not ask the servers to fill your glass as this decreases the number of tasting opportunities for others. Soda, coffee and water are available at no charge.

There are five steps to tasting wine: Look, Tilt, Swirl, Smell & Taste.

Look at the Wine. About one ounce of wine should be poured into a clean glass (water provided). Hold the glass in front of a white background like a tablecloth or piece of paper. Some people even use the cuff of their shirt sleeve if it is white. Young white wines are light in color, with a green to straw tint. As white wines age, the color deepens and changes from green to straw to yellow to gold to brown. The rule of thumb is the deeper the color, the more aged the white wine. Red wine is dark purple when young. As red wine ages, it turns from purple to garnet to red-brick to brown.

Tilt the Glass. Slightly tilt the glass and look at the edge of the wine. If the edge is purple, that is another clue that the wine is young. An orange or brown edge indicates that the wine has aged.

Swirl the Glass. Swirl the wine and observe the “body.” Wine with “good legs” is thicker in body and will leave a thin coating on the glass when it is tilted. This tells you that the wine has a higher alcohol content and may be sweeter.

Smell the Bouquet. Swirl the wine again. This releases more of the wine’s aroma or bouquet (or nose). Smell the wine’s aroma and try to describe it. Fine wines have a complex bouquet and several elements can be identified.

Taste the Wine. At last! Take a small sip of the wine and slosh it around your mouth. Wine experts suck in additional air to release even more of the wine’s bouquet and enhance their ability to taste. Try to identify the flavors. Can you taste grapes, flowers, spice, oak, even chocolate? Note the body or texture: Is it light or rich, smooth or harsh? What kind of aftertaste does it have? How long did the aftertaste last? Was it pleasant?

Cleanse Your Palate. Eat an oyster cracker, rinse your mouth and glass with water, and then pour your glass’ s rinse water into the brightly colored bucket.

To preserve your palate. The rule of thumb is to taste Whites followed by Reds, Dry Whites followed by Sweet Whites, and Light Reds followed by Full-bodied Reds.
